Not all children get a favored start in life. Many are less lucky. About 15 million American children live in poverty. Most of their families work but scramble to meet daily needs. Paychecks for low skill jobs haven't kept up with rising prices. Parents may need to skimp on all but the basics.

Children who live in poverty may not eat well. They are less likely to attend preschool. Teens from low income homes are more likely to drop out of high school.
Poor children feel more stress, which can lead to health problems. In 1964, President	97
Lyndon Johnson began the War on Poverty. He was concerned about the one family in five that lacked the basics. He focused on health care, food, education, and housing. "Too many Americans live on the outskirts of hope," Johnson said.

Johnson's War on Poverty began programs that still support poor families. Programs149include Medicaid, food stamps, and housing vouchers. Since 1964, trillions of dollars161have been spent on this war. But today, too many children are still poor. Budgets for177children's programs are often strained.182

Although low income children have more support today than in 1964, not all their196needs are met. Groups like the Children's Defense Fund advocate for poor children.209They work to expand health care, preschool, and job training.219

Part 3: Comprehension and discussion

The Children's Defense Fund is working to expand health care, preschool, and job training to help poor families. Would you add anything to the list of what they are working toward?

What would your partner add to the list?
